One customer's experience

An Insured contacted us after receiving notification that they were being sued by a movie production company who determined that they had downloaded copyrighted material to their home computer without the company's permission. The insured advised that this was not true and had to hire an attorney to defend them in court. We determined that the insured's residence high speed network internet protocol (IP) address was indeed stolen and used by a stranger to download the copyrighted material. An IP address is a form of personal identifying information. The Insured's attorney of choice was approved by HSB and under the policy provisions, the Insured was reimbursed for legal expenses incurred to demonstrate in a court of law that their identity was indeed "stolen" and prove their innocence. The case was dismissed.
